PREFACE

This bibliographic research is the second update of Filipino philosophy: A critical bibliography [1774-1992]. The first update—from 1993 to 1997—was finished in 1999. Every five years, an update is conducted so that researchers will be abreast with the current works directly or indirectly related to Filipino philosophy.

The explanations I made in the Preface of the 1993-1997 update still applies for this update so I will just quote from there:

As earlier explained (Gripaldo 1996:3-4), Filipino philosophy has three shades of meaning or, to put it differently, the study of Filipino philosophy has three approaches. First, we have the anthropological approach or the collective view of the Filipino weltanschauung about life, time, ethics, God, etc. Leonardo Mercado (1974:1-244) based this generally on linguistic considerations of three tribes: Tagalog, Visayan, and Ilokano. Florentino Timbreza (1982:1-148) included riddles and sayings while Florentino Hornedo and Vitaliano Gorospe focused on myths and epics. The second approach is traditional, or that which has been generally used in the discipline of philosophy. The compiler sometimes label this as the “philosophical approach” in the sense that it is the dominant approach used by historians of philosophy. When philosophers and historians of philosophy speak, for instance, of “Greek philosophy,” they enumerate individual Greek thinkers or philosophers. The same is true with “British philosophy,” “French philosophy,” or “German philosophy.” Consequently, properly speaking, when we speak of “Filipino philosophy,” we should be able to enumerate Filipino thinkers or philosophers. The compiler has specialized in this approach. The last is the constitutional approach. This is problematic. It refers to works written by Filipino authors but the subject matter is essentially non-Filipino or foreign. Such works as Laureen Velasco’s “The social philosophy of Plato” (1993-94) or Manuel Dy’s “The positive value of wu wei in the Tao te ching” are such examples. These are Western and Chinese philosophies all right, but there is an element of Filipino interpretation involved. As such, each work can still be considered a Filipino philosophy by virtue of its authorship, that is to say, the author is “Filipino” as defined legally in the Philippine constitution. In this respect, naturalized Filipinos such as John Schumacher, SJ will be considered as themselves Filipinos. Moreover, any foreigner who writes on the subject matter that is essentially Filipino [in character] will have to be included in this bibliography. An example is Eugene Hessel who wrote The religious thought of Jose Rizal (1983).

It is a matter of course that any research of this sort will have to allow a margin of error which, to my mind, is plus or minus five percent (5%) in that given the meager budget and the limited time, and considering the concurrent work of the researcher as teacher and administrator, and the graduate research assistant as a graduate student, it was impossible to visit all the important schools and seminaries of the Philippine archipelago. Occasionally provincial journals contain one or two entries in an issue. In the Philippines there are only three journals which are essentially philosophy: Φιλοσοφία of the Philippine National Philosophical Research Society, Karunungan of the Philippine Academy of Philosophical Research, and the Phavisminda Journal of the Philosophical Association of the Visayas and Mindanao. As to the other source of error, let me quote again from the previous update as that observation also applies in this particular case: “Another source of error may lie in the possibility that a few philosophy items in the works I have examined may have been overlooked. But like the mother work, they will be corrected if discovered in the future.”

As to the explanation of the term “critical bibliography,” I will repeat what I quoted in the first update because this explanation still holds:

The term “critical bibliography” was first used in literature in order to determine, among others, (a) the exactness of the date as to when an extant manuscript was written, (b) the accuracy of its authorship, or (c) both. No such thing was done in this present bibliographic work....[In this particular update, 1998-2002, the compiler simply makes a tabulation.]. The compiler finds this more convenient than making an annotation of each bibliographic entry. An annotation may not be critical, or analytical, but may only be explanatory. The closest thing done on critical bibliography similar to that in literature was to determine whether the author is a Filipino or a foreigner and whether the given bibliographic entry belongs, for example, to this or that category. In a sense—in view of ...the discrimination of entries with respect to authorship (Filipino or otherwise) and to category—this work goes beyond the pale of enumerative or systematic bibliography (Gripaldo 1996:v).

There is an added feature of this update, viz., the compiler has included as appendices (1) the overlooked materials from the previous bibliographic works and (2) the various journals and newspapers/magazines consulted.

Before ending this Preface, the compiler would like to express his gratitude to all those who, in one way or another, has helped me in making this work possible, but more particularly to Dr. Rainier Ibana, the chair of the Philosophy Department of the Ateneo de Manila University, for lending me his works and for providing me the list of works of the Ateneo faculty; Dr. Leonardo de Castro for emailing me his biodata; the College Research Fund of the DLSU College of Liberal Arts for granting me a modest research fund; and most especially, Mr. James Esguerra for serving as my graduate research assistant and for uncomplainingly spending his time and effort in the gathering of data and other related matters.

INTRODUCTION

The present update (1998-2002) has more entries than the first update (1993-97) in the sense that there are more periodicals and books consulted. However, it is very noticeable that there are a number of entries overlooked from the first update which the compiler is now attaching as Appendix 1. There are in fact 39 pages of these entries. So, by and large, the first update is comparable in output to the second update if we count the items overlooked. What is important is that we are moving to our cherished goal: the comprehensive bibliographic listing of works in Filipino philosophy.

There are 26 chapters in the current update while there were only 23 chapters in the first update. We have added the Philosophy of Culture, Philosophy of Myth, and Pragmatism/Neopragmatism. Appendix 2—on the periodicals consulted—is now attached: 125 journals and 9 broadsheets.
